

NSUKKA DIOCESAN SEMINARIANS

BEHOLD 2020/2021

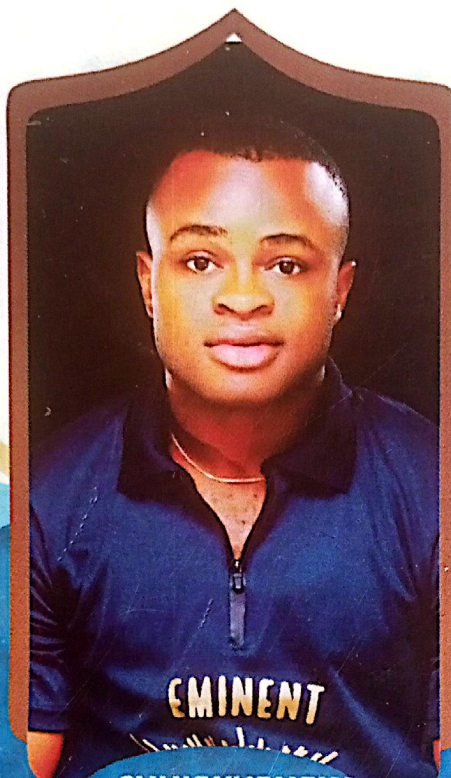

PHILOSOPHY GRADUANDS

CHIMEBUKA
(RB)

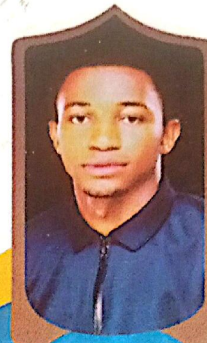

CHINONSO
(Christ bearer)

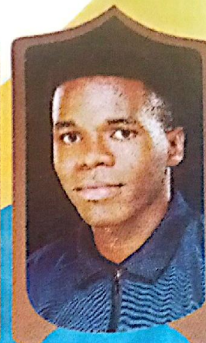

EMINENT
CHUKWUEMEKA
(Emmy Mayor)

Determination is a step towards achieving success

KOSISOCHUKWU
(Eskimo)

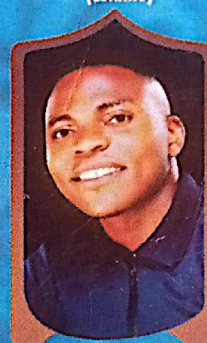

CHISOM
(Sanctuary)

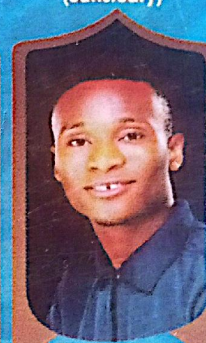

CHIBUEZE
(PD Ali)

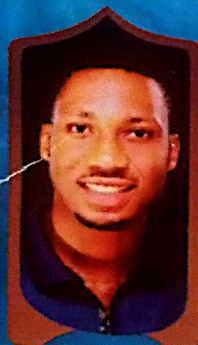

NNAEMEKA
(Metete)

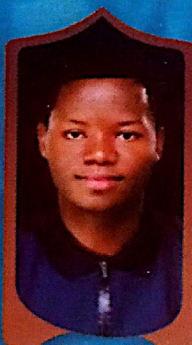

UCHECHUKWU
(Drobgba)

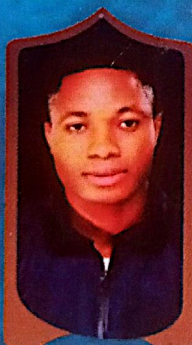

CHUKWUDI
(Urgent)

CHUKWUEMEKA
(Emperor)

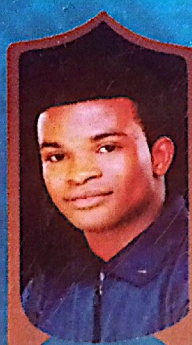

CHIEDOZI

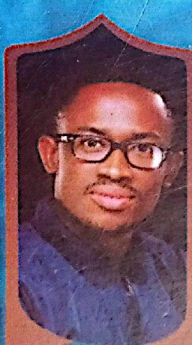

NNAEMEKA
(Chrisbosco)

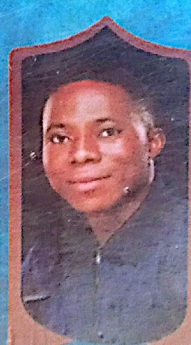

CHUKWUKADIBIA

IFEANYICHUKWU

KELECHI
(Nothing Pass God)

CHEKWUBECHUKWU

NAME

CLASS

SUBJECT

DATE

BA/B Phil Comp

40
LEAVES

* The self (concept of the self) from different traditions.

1. What are the basic conditions and predispositions that are indispensable for a meaningful and enriching cross-cultural philosophical engagement.

2. Identify and assess the ~~factors~~ that constitute ~~obstacles~~ and ~~challenges~~ to Comparative philosophy.

3. Discuss the meaning, the need for, and the goal of Comparative philosophy.

b. What sense of the term 'comparison' is most suitable for the course Comparative philosophy?

4. To what extent do the distinctive social practices of the ancient Chinese tradition resonate with their approach to philosophy especially with regard to agency, harmony and freedom.

5.

~~The are~~
There are conditions and predispositions which are necessary in the study of Comparative philosophy.

1. UNIVERSALISM.

The nature of human beings as rational animals place on them a general, and common characteristics and traits. Therefore, in cross-cultural dialogue the assumption of species equality renders every human being equal and capable of engaging in any cross-cultural philosophical engagement.

It is this awareness of universal orientations which unites every human being that enables a successful cross-cultural engagement in comparative philosophy. Any form of segregation initiates bias and injustice.

2. There should not be any cultural or linguistic bias:-

Language is one of the major attribute that identifies a culture, hence it differs from our culture to another. Therefore in the study of Comparative philosophy one has to bear in mind the no language should be made superior over other languages since such attitude ~~would~~ might becloud his judgment of other cultures in his cross cultural engagement.

Language is relative as such, there is a tendency of relativism playing out. Hence, in cross-cultural dialogue the individuals involved should keep it in mind.

3. There are no preconditions in cross-cultural dialogue.

A necessary precondition for cross-cultural dialogue in comparative philosophy is that there is no condition for dialogue. This implies that there is no yardstick culture which is used in measuring other cultures.

This places all philosophical engagements from different cultures on the same platform to enable a successful cross cultural dialogue.

4. There must be willingness to engage in dialogue.

It is important that the individuals involved in Cross cultural engagement are eager and willing to engage other cultures. Willingness allow the individual to break the boundaries of his own point of view and come to the acceptance of the universal orientation of all men.

5. There is no one single meaning or Truth.

Comparative philosophy does not call for prejudgment of any culture, but rather an objective and collective search for meaning. This is because the multiplicity of cultures, environment, ^{and} genetic-make-up replaces on philosophy the nature of diversity. Therefore, to engage in any meaningful cross-cultural philosophical dialogue, one has to acknowledge that there are other perspectives and philosophies, which might be different from his views.

6. Humility.

As we expand in knowledge we find out that there are still a lot to be known. Hence humility is necessary to enable one learn from another person or from another culture. Humility also helps the individual ~~and~~ involved in cross-cultural engagement to be able to accommodate other points of views.

7. Docility

This refers to being elastic or malleable in ones assumptions. This is important because without the attribute of docility one may tend to ignore the points of views of other people.

Docility enables one to transcend the possibility for bias and prejudice towards other cultures in order for cross cultural dialogue to be meaningful.

8. Openness.

Without openness comparative philosophy will be impossible or more still difficult. Openness is the attitude and disposition that is enlightened with the fact that there are diversity of philosophies, thereby, giving room for understanding and accommodation of other perspectives.

Evaluation.

- Discuss the meaning, the need for and the goal of comparative philosophy
- What sense of the word "Comparison" is most suitable for the course Comparative philosophy.

Meaning of Comparative philosophy.

Philosophy is a discipline which is viewed from different approaches. As an academic discipline and as an existential approach.

From the existential approach of philosophy, it is seen as a human quality. This essentially means that philosophy has to do with our conscious relationship with the world, the world outlook that imbues our life with meaning and our conception of it.

It also speaks of philosophy born ~~of~~ out of man's curiosity in his engagement with his environment. However, since there are different environments and cultures and the engagement of people with it we speak of multiplicity of cultures philosophies.

Also since the capacity to think is general and common to everyone, we speak of the universality of philosophy, but when it is approached from different perspectives by different cultures and societies in their engagement with their environment we have a multiplicity of philosophies. As such there is no one way in doing philosophy because there are diversity of factors and variety of interests.

As a result of this multiplicity in philosophy the idea of comparism comes into play.

Comparative philosophy is therefore a branch of philosophical discourse which focuses on the multiple ways people think and compare similarities and differences.

It is a branch of philosophy that deals with the multiplicity of philosophical approaches by subjecting their similarities and differences into a comparative discourse.

THE NEED FOR COMPARATIVE PHILOSOPHY.

1. To Correct Bias.

This is one of the major needs of comparative philosophy because there is a western bias in philosophy in which every other philosophical appr

• Each that is not western is considered as inferior. Hence Comparative philosophy acknowledges that philosophy is not a property of west or any particular group of people.

It ensures that no philosophy is made standard for others and no philosophy is made inferior to other philosophies.

Assert Equal Legitimacy of philosophies.

The birth of contemporary African philosophy was necessitated to fight against the ^{denial} rejection of African philosophical ideas, making African philosophy unequal to western philosophy on cross cultural dialogue.

Therefore comparative philosophy is important to ensure that every philosophy is ^{given} ~~made~~ equal legitimacy since every society has different ways of philosophic engagement.

- More Universal Approach to Learning

THE GOAL OF COMPARATIVE PHILOSOPHY.

1. To widen the horizon of knowledge.

Through cross cultural engagement, various philosophical engagements are shared as such helping to widen their knowledge toward a particular aspect of engagement and more.

For instance, the ancient greek philosophers like Socrates, Plato and Aristotle have helped us widen our knowledge and improve on various philosophical understanding.

2. Enrichment of philosophical enterprise.

Through Cross-cultural dialogue new concepts are realized either by reconciliation of conflicting views and understanding, as such enriching the philosophical ~~and~~ engagement in such areas.

Also, various philosophical groups through comparative philosophy would be able to discover loopholes in their philosophy or various ways through which they can enrich their approach to a particular engagement, which is made possible on cross cultural dialogue.

What sense of the word Comparism is most suitable for Comparative philosophy.

There are two aspects of Comparism.

The first type of Comparism a comparism from the center or within the middle of a discourse. Here the Comparans (subject) is in the center and as the gover of meaning to what is being compared. This gives room for prejudice and bias.

On the other hand, the Comparans (subject) takes itself away from the center of comparanda (the objects of Comparism). Here the Comparanda stands in the middle while the comparans stands outside and views the comparanda from a disinterested perspective.

However, comparative philosophy makes use of this second approach of comparism. As such the subject through a disinterested perspective of not placing one above the other makes comparison of different philosophies, in doing so, he avoids bias and prejudice.

Therefore Comparism that is suitable on comparative philosophy is the type of Comparism where the Subject makes comparison from a disinterested perspective outside what is being compared.